

VeloCity wins ideas competition for development of Oxford and Cambridge region

Jessica Mairs | 12 December 2017 | 10 comments

A team of architects, planners and engineers has won a contest seeking ideas for how the UK government could instigate growth in the Cambridge-Milton Keynes-Oxford corridor, with plans to revitalise six villages by adding housing, and a network of cycling and pedestrian routes.

The "all-women team" comprises Jennifer Ross of Tibbalds Planning and Urban Design, Sarah Featherstone of Featherstone Young, Kay Hughes from Khaa, Petra Marko of Marko and Placemakers, Annalie Riches of Mikhail Riches and Judith Sykes of Expedition Engineering.

Their proposal focuses on developing six villages to the southeast of a new railway station on the route between Oxford and Cambridge. The idea is that the plans could be repeated in other locations across the arc.

"Our re-imagination of the 21st century village will